CONSUMERS

CHIP-IN FOR YOUR SECURITY

Cards are safer than cash or checks—and they are about to get even safer for you. New EMV chip cards are being introduced in the U.S. to help prevent fraudulent purchases from counterfeit cards. Millions of chip cards will be in consumers' wallets by the end of 2015. You can prevent counterfeit card fraud when you use cards with chip technology. Master Your Card is here to help you make the change.

Why chip cards are important. Magnetic stripe cards are vulnerable to counterfeiting because the data that fraudsters need is easy to read and copy since it never changes. Because the U.S. is one of the last markets to convert from magnetic stripe to chip cards, our businesses have become the prime target for criminals and fraud has increased. Chip cards will help protect you with better payment technology.

Advanced security with chip cards. Chip technology moves sensitive card information that's currently stored in the magnetic stripe to a small gold or silver colored computer chip embedded in the card. Instead of sliding the card, you insert the chip card into a slot or tap it on a chip-enabled payment terminal to complete your purchase. The chip on the card and the terminal work together to generate an encrypted code that makes each transaction unique. That makes it harder for counterfeiters to get the information they need to duplicate your card. It's that simple. And that's why chip cards have been so successful everywhere they are used.

It's easy to chip-in. If your card has a gold or silver colored rectangular chip, you have all you need. Just follow the prompts at the terminal. Your new chip card will still include the magnetic stripe on the back, so you won't get stuck at a business that doesn't have a chip-enabled payment terminal. If you don't have a chip on your payment card, let your bank know you are interested. If your employer offers a payroll card, tell them as well.
